THE CHILDREN'S CORNER

By Mrs. N. K. Wood

A long while ago there lived a noted old man who had a large family, of whom he was very proud and he loved them all, but the one next to the youngest was an exceptionally obedient and affectionate son. On this one the father bestowed more attention, and after he grew to be a lad of seventeen his father gave him a more beautiful coat than the other brothers had, and they grew indignant and treated their younger brother roughly. They had been guilty of some wickedness and he reported it to their father—then they hated him. One night this brother, whose name was Joseph, dreamed a strange dream and he told it to his brothers. He dreamed that they were all binding sheaves in the field and his sheaf rose up and stood, and their sheaves stood round about and bowed to his sheaf. This made them more angry, for they seemed to feel they should have to bow down to Joseph. Then he dreamed another dream, he said the sun and moon and eleven stars bowed down to him. Now there were just eleven brothers and they thought the eleven stars must mean them, and the sun and moon, their father and mother. They said, shall our brother be greater than we? and they were displeased. Joseph told the dream to his father, and he found fault with him. He said shall we bow down to the earth to thee? There came a day when ten of the brothers went with their flocks to pasture them in another section of the country. After they had been gone a long while the father became anxious to hear from them and as there was no other way but to send Joseph, he gathered up a lot of good things to eat and sent Joseph away to find them and bring back word how they were getting along with their work.

Joseph traveled a long way to the place where he expected to find them, but the place was bare and he wandered about in the field not knowing what to do. A man met him and said: What are you looking for? He told him he was trying to find the herdsman, who were his brothers. The man told him where to find them quite a distance further; so he sat out on his journey quite weary and tired but found the camp and drew up in sight of the brothers who were lounging together at that hour and they saw him at a distance and said to each other, Yonder comes the dreamer! Let's put an end to his dreams. Kill him and put him in a pit. No don't let's kill him, said the oldest one. Just drop him in that deep pit and leave him there to die. Ruben thought he would take him out after the others were gone and take him back to his father. They consented to this and pretty soon Joseph drew near weary and foot-sore, but glad to rest in sight. Glad to see his brothers and to give them the nice things he had brought to them from home. Do you think they gave him a place to sit down to rest and tell the news from home? No, they received him roughly and began to strip him of his beautiful "coat of many colors" and to upbraid him for his superiority, and they took him to the deep pit—perhaps an old dry well—and let him down. Now, Reuben went off about his business and was not in the camp when a band of trading men were passing on their way down into Egypt a long way off. One of the brothers said, what's the good in killing Joseph; let's sell him to these merchants; and to this they all consented. The men with their camels drew up and when the offer to sell a lad was made they said, we give you twenty pieces of silver for him. So they drew Joseph up out of the pit, and they took him away.

Ruben came from his work and went to the pit to take Joseph out but he was not there; and being greatly distressed, because he wanted to take him back to his father, he went to find his brothers, and said, Joseph is taken away, and I, where shall I go? And the brothers took Joseph's coat and they killed a kid, and dipped the coat in its blood, and took it to their father and said we found this coat and know not whether it is Joseph's, but Jacob, the father, knew and he said, of truth, this is my son's coat, an evil beast has devoured him. Joseph is without doubt torn to pieces; and the old father rent his clothes, which showed great distress, and he put on sackcloth, a coarse cloth that people put on to show the deepest grief and he mourned many days. There was no one who could comfort him, for he said "I shall go down to my grave mourning."

The merchant men took Joseph down into Egypt and sold him to an officer of the King, and he became his servant. The Lord was with Joseph and helped him to please his master greatly so that he set him over all the servants and gave him the care of the house, and prospered because the Lord was with Joseph. After a while the master went away from home, and when he returned a false report was made against Joseph and he was thrown bound in prison, but the Lord did not forsake him. He made the keeper of the prison his friend and he gave the care of all the men in prison to him, and he watched them no more. So well did Joseph for him.

Two of the King's servants offended him and he put them in the same prison with Joseph, who had the care of them. One was the chief baker and the other was the butler who served wine to the King. One day they seemed very sad and Joseph enquired of them of their sadness, and they each told him of a dream they had the night before, and they were sad because there was no interpreter. Joseph said, cannot God interpret all things? So they told him their dream. The chief butler thought he saw a vine, on which were three bunches of grapes, and in his hand held the King's cup, and he took the grapes and pressed the juice out into the cup and gave it to the King to drink.

Joseph told him the three bunches of grapes represented three days, and in three days the King would take him out and restore him his position and he would again wait upon the King as he once did.

Then Joseph asked him to remember him, when he should come into the King's house, that he might be taken out of prison; for he said, I have been here and I have done nothing for which I should be in prison.

When the chief baker saw that the butler's dream meant good he told his dream; he thought he was carrying three baskets on his head, one above the other. In the highest basket were all kinds of meat for the King, and the birds flew down and ate the meats out of the basket. Then Joseph told him three baskets meant three days. In three days you will be hanged on a tree and the birds will fly down after your death and eat your flesh from your bones. This was a fearful interpretation, but in three days the King had a birthday and invited all of his servants to a feast, and he sent for the butler and restored him to his place and he gave the wine cup to the King as he did normally, but the baker he hanged on a tree.

The chief butler did not remember Joseph when he was again in the King's house; he forgot all of his kindness. Don't you think he was very ungrateful? Two years passed and then something happened.

I'll tell you next week what it was that brought Joseph out of prison.
